These numbers are represented by various barcode types, depending on how they're designed, with the most common currently being the DataMatrix barcode and the QR code. Many apps use barcodes to work out what a user has scanned, but if you have your own app, how do you work out that information? This video shows you how. Code, meet OCR, and eye pattern recognition First, you need an app that can read the barcode, then you need a way to match it with the code you've scanned. This is where OCR comes in. If you've ever scanned a code and not got a matching company name, it's more likely that your scanner wasn't up to scratch. It's also useful for reading and recording barcodes that are too small for a camera. A second problem with trying to scan a barcode is that it's easy to read codes that have been printed on white or near-white backgrounds. This is because the camera needs some way of determining that the code is in focus, and white is the easiest way of doing that. To overcome this, some scanners use eye pattern recognition, which uses a camera to look at the eye and compare it to a database of known eye patterns. The best app for this is called CyrKey, which is free for PC, Mac, Linux, iOS and Android. It's available from the Play store and the App Store. Putting it all together Once you've got your camera and app up and running, here's how you use them to put data together. Let's start with the app. Turn on your scanner with the code it's designed for Open the app for the barcode you're interested in Pick
