

The new motion capture engine, which is said to offer up to four times the detail in animations compared to previous versions of the game, was originally revealed to Electronic Sports World Championship Media in a video, which can be seen below. The HyperMotion engine will be integrated into FIFA 22 before its release this summer and will be available to all EA Sports FIFA players through the in-game options menu. Commenting on the engine's development, FIFA producer Aaron McHardy said: "We did a lot of data analysis before making this new engine, but it's nearly impossible to turn down a challenge like that. Not only are we creating a brand-new engine and going well beyond what's possible with current technology, but we're building on the work of incredible Motion Capture studios. "These aren't just regular suits that we're using, but outfits with 24 cameras that analyse every aspect of a player's movement throughout the game. And we're only just beginning to scratch the surface of the detail we can capture from players and get from the game." McHardy continued: "We've been talking with players and teams about their experiences from previous FIFA game, such as World Cup and Champions League, and we're having great discussions with players, teams, sport teams, researchers and visionaries from around the world. I'm sure that players will find this the most authentic simulation of the real thing ever delivered in the history of the game." As the official EA Sports FIFA League of Legends World Championship website states: "We did an analysis of over two million hits of every player in FIFA 20. The real player captured the best player from the real match data. We have improved the old Fifa (2015) and the engine also was improved." Zus is a journalist that grew up playing football.
